Not illustrated. 1907 Excerpt: .The first stage in the development only necessitated tramcar controllers of larger capacity, whereas the second stage introduced new conditions. Not only were the motors increased, but, further, the controller was mounted in a locomotive. This gave rise to structural differences. Further developments took place in the composition of the trains, in some cases there being a locomotive passenger car at each end of the train, and in other cases trains of six or seven carriages being coupled to a single locomotive. As time went on railway controllers got larger and larger, until the system was introduced of making up the trains of a number of motorcars and a number of trailer cars with the object of splitting up the train into several component parts, each part being capable of selfpropulsion. This system required and was made possible by the introduction of the multiple unit control system, in which each motor-car was equipped with its own motors, controllers and resistances, and all the controllers were fitted with devices whereby they were all worked simultaneously by the driver in the front of the train. This new condition at first gave rise to numerous schemes for connecting the individual controllers; but later the controllers themselves have been modified to meet the fresh requirements, by the substitution of a number of separate switches, each one controlled electrically by the driver. These switches being opened and closed in their proper order effected all the changes usually made by the controller...
